When Does Overconfidence Harm You? An Experimental Study on Learning with Misspecified Beliefs

(with Marco Castillo)

Abstract: Individuals often have subjective, potentially incorrect mental models of the world, which can hinder learning from feedback and perpetuate suboptimal behavior. While nudges or information disclosure are commonly used to mitigate behavioral biases, their effectiveness may be limited when these mistakes arise from incorrect mental models. This paper focuses on an instance of misspecified mental models: misspecified self-belief which is characterized by individuals overestimating (or underestimating) their ability compared to others and failing to consider their true rank as a feasible possibility. Using a laboratory experiment, we document misspecified overconfidence leads to persistent task misallocation in situations where the optimal allocation requires identifying each team member's ability separately. However, an institutional change that bases allocation on the team's combined ability eliminates this harm. These findings offer insights into designing team incentives that are not susceptible to the harm of misspecified overconfidence. Moreover, because incorrect and misspecified mental models are widespread and often challenging to rectify, this paper contributes to discussions on effective interventions that design institutional interventions rather than attempting to correct misconceptions directly.
